CALL FOR APPLICATIONS

We are looking for six young scientists – two each from Germany, Russia, and the United States – in the fields of chemistry, physics or astronomy (other STEM subjects also welcome) to share their passion for science with a broad and intercultural audience at an unconventional and enjoyable evening event in an iconic Berlin venue.

What is the Trilateral Science Slam? It's a fun event with a succession of rapid-fire presentations of original research by young scientists in their native languages – on stage in front of a live audience. It is a chance to let personality shine in a 10-minute performance. Slammers deliver an exciting and approachable version of otherwise complex research. And they compete for the hearts and minds of the audience, whose applause determines the winner!

What do you need? Original research in your area of expertise. The courage and joy to share your passion for science with the general public. You should be able to arrive in Berlin on Saturday, June 16 and remain until Tuesday, June 19 to take part in coaching sessions and rehearsals prior to the slam. Applicants selected to participate in the slam will be provided round-trip travel to and accommodation in Berlin.

How do you benefit? Personal coaching on presentation skills with experienced Science Slam show producers; close collaboration with a simultaneous interpreter; an audience for your own research and exposure to cutting-edge science; and networking with colleagues from other scientific fields and countries.

The Trilateral Science Slam is part of the Fulbright-Cottrell Junior Faculty Professional Development Workshop taking place in Berlin from June 18 to 20. Slammers are welcome to attend the workshop.
